

Features of two schools of thought in Islamic Economics

Abstract: There are two schools of thought in Islamic Economics: “school of economic jurisprudence” and “school of economic literature”. These two schools are different in the definition of Islamic economics, issues discussed, and topics for study by the scholar of each school, method and works. The school of economic jurisprudence has a great legacy emanating from Islamic religion, but its evolution is slow and doesn't include all aspects of economic life. The evolution of the school of economic literature is rapid, update and more practical, but it has not Islamic originality and basics.